land. This passionate appeal, in which some truth was mingled with many errors and misrepresentations, was not without effect in London. The Huguenot agents, the Vidame de Chartres with his indomitable perseverance, La Haye with his insinuating methods of proceeding, did not relax their pressure upon the Queen's ministers. Elizabeth took one more step, and recalled her Ambassador from Paris; and then, as though alarmed at the effect which this measure produced in France, she ceased it. This measure produced no effect. The Queen then announced the speedy coming of the French envoy. But she had already made up her mind. At the beginning of August the preliminary agreement had been drawn up between Cecil and the Vidame; English officers had gone to inspect the fortifications of Dieppe and Havre; and La Haye had written to Condé to announce to him the immediate arrival of six guns and a third of the sum he had asked. In short, as the position of the Protestants was becoming day by day more critical, under the pressure of circumstances, Cecil, having induced their agents to yield to all his demands, concluded with them the Treaty of Hampton Court. The Queen undertook to place ten thousand men in Havre, and to furnish three thousand more for the defence of Rouen and the castle of Dieppe. She also undertook to allow the Protestants one hundred and forty thousand écus d'or. But the fortress of Havre was completely handed over to the Queen, and whoever should command it in her name had the power of limiting the number of French, even of Protestants, who should be allowed to reside in the
